

A photograph of the USS Theodore Roosevelt (SSBN 600) at sea. The submarine is dark grey and has a large conning tower with a single antenna. It is moving through the water, leaving a white wake. The sea is a deep blue-grey, and the sky is a pale, overcast blue.

The ship's colorful insignia shows President Theodore Roosevelt holding a Polaris submarine in his hands. This insignia was designed by Commander W. E. Sims, the ship's first commanding officer.

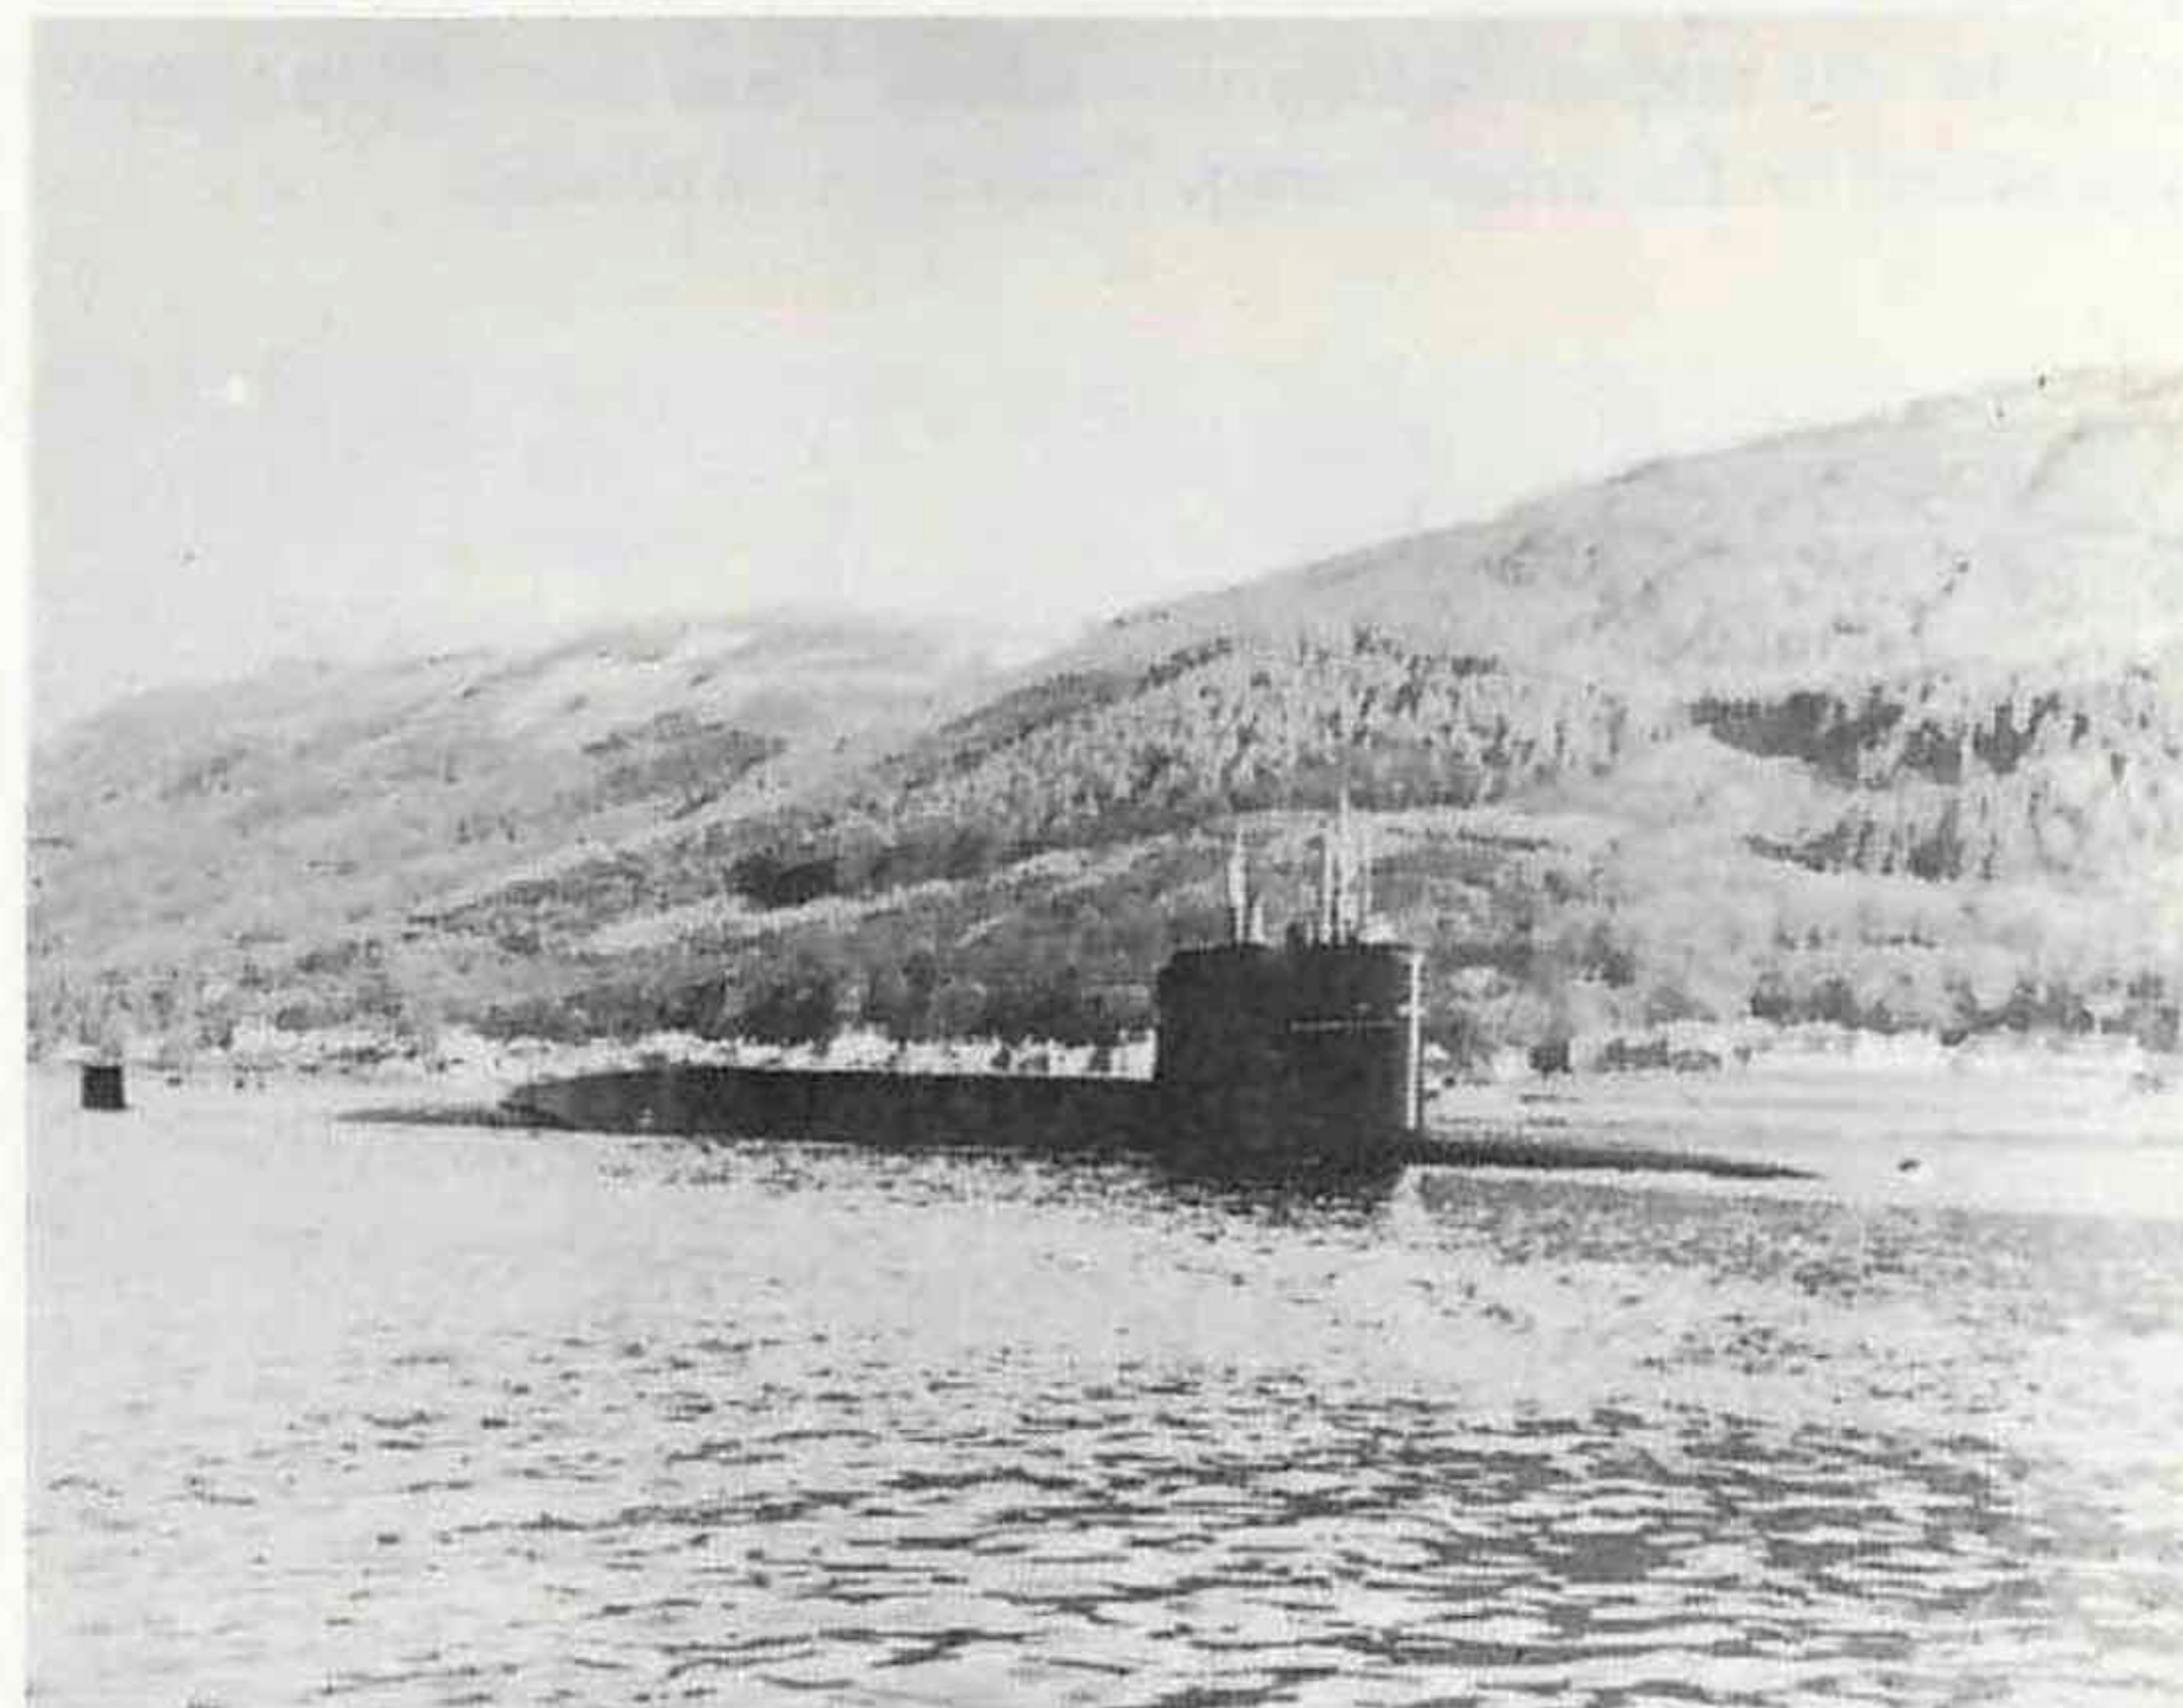

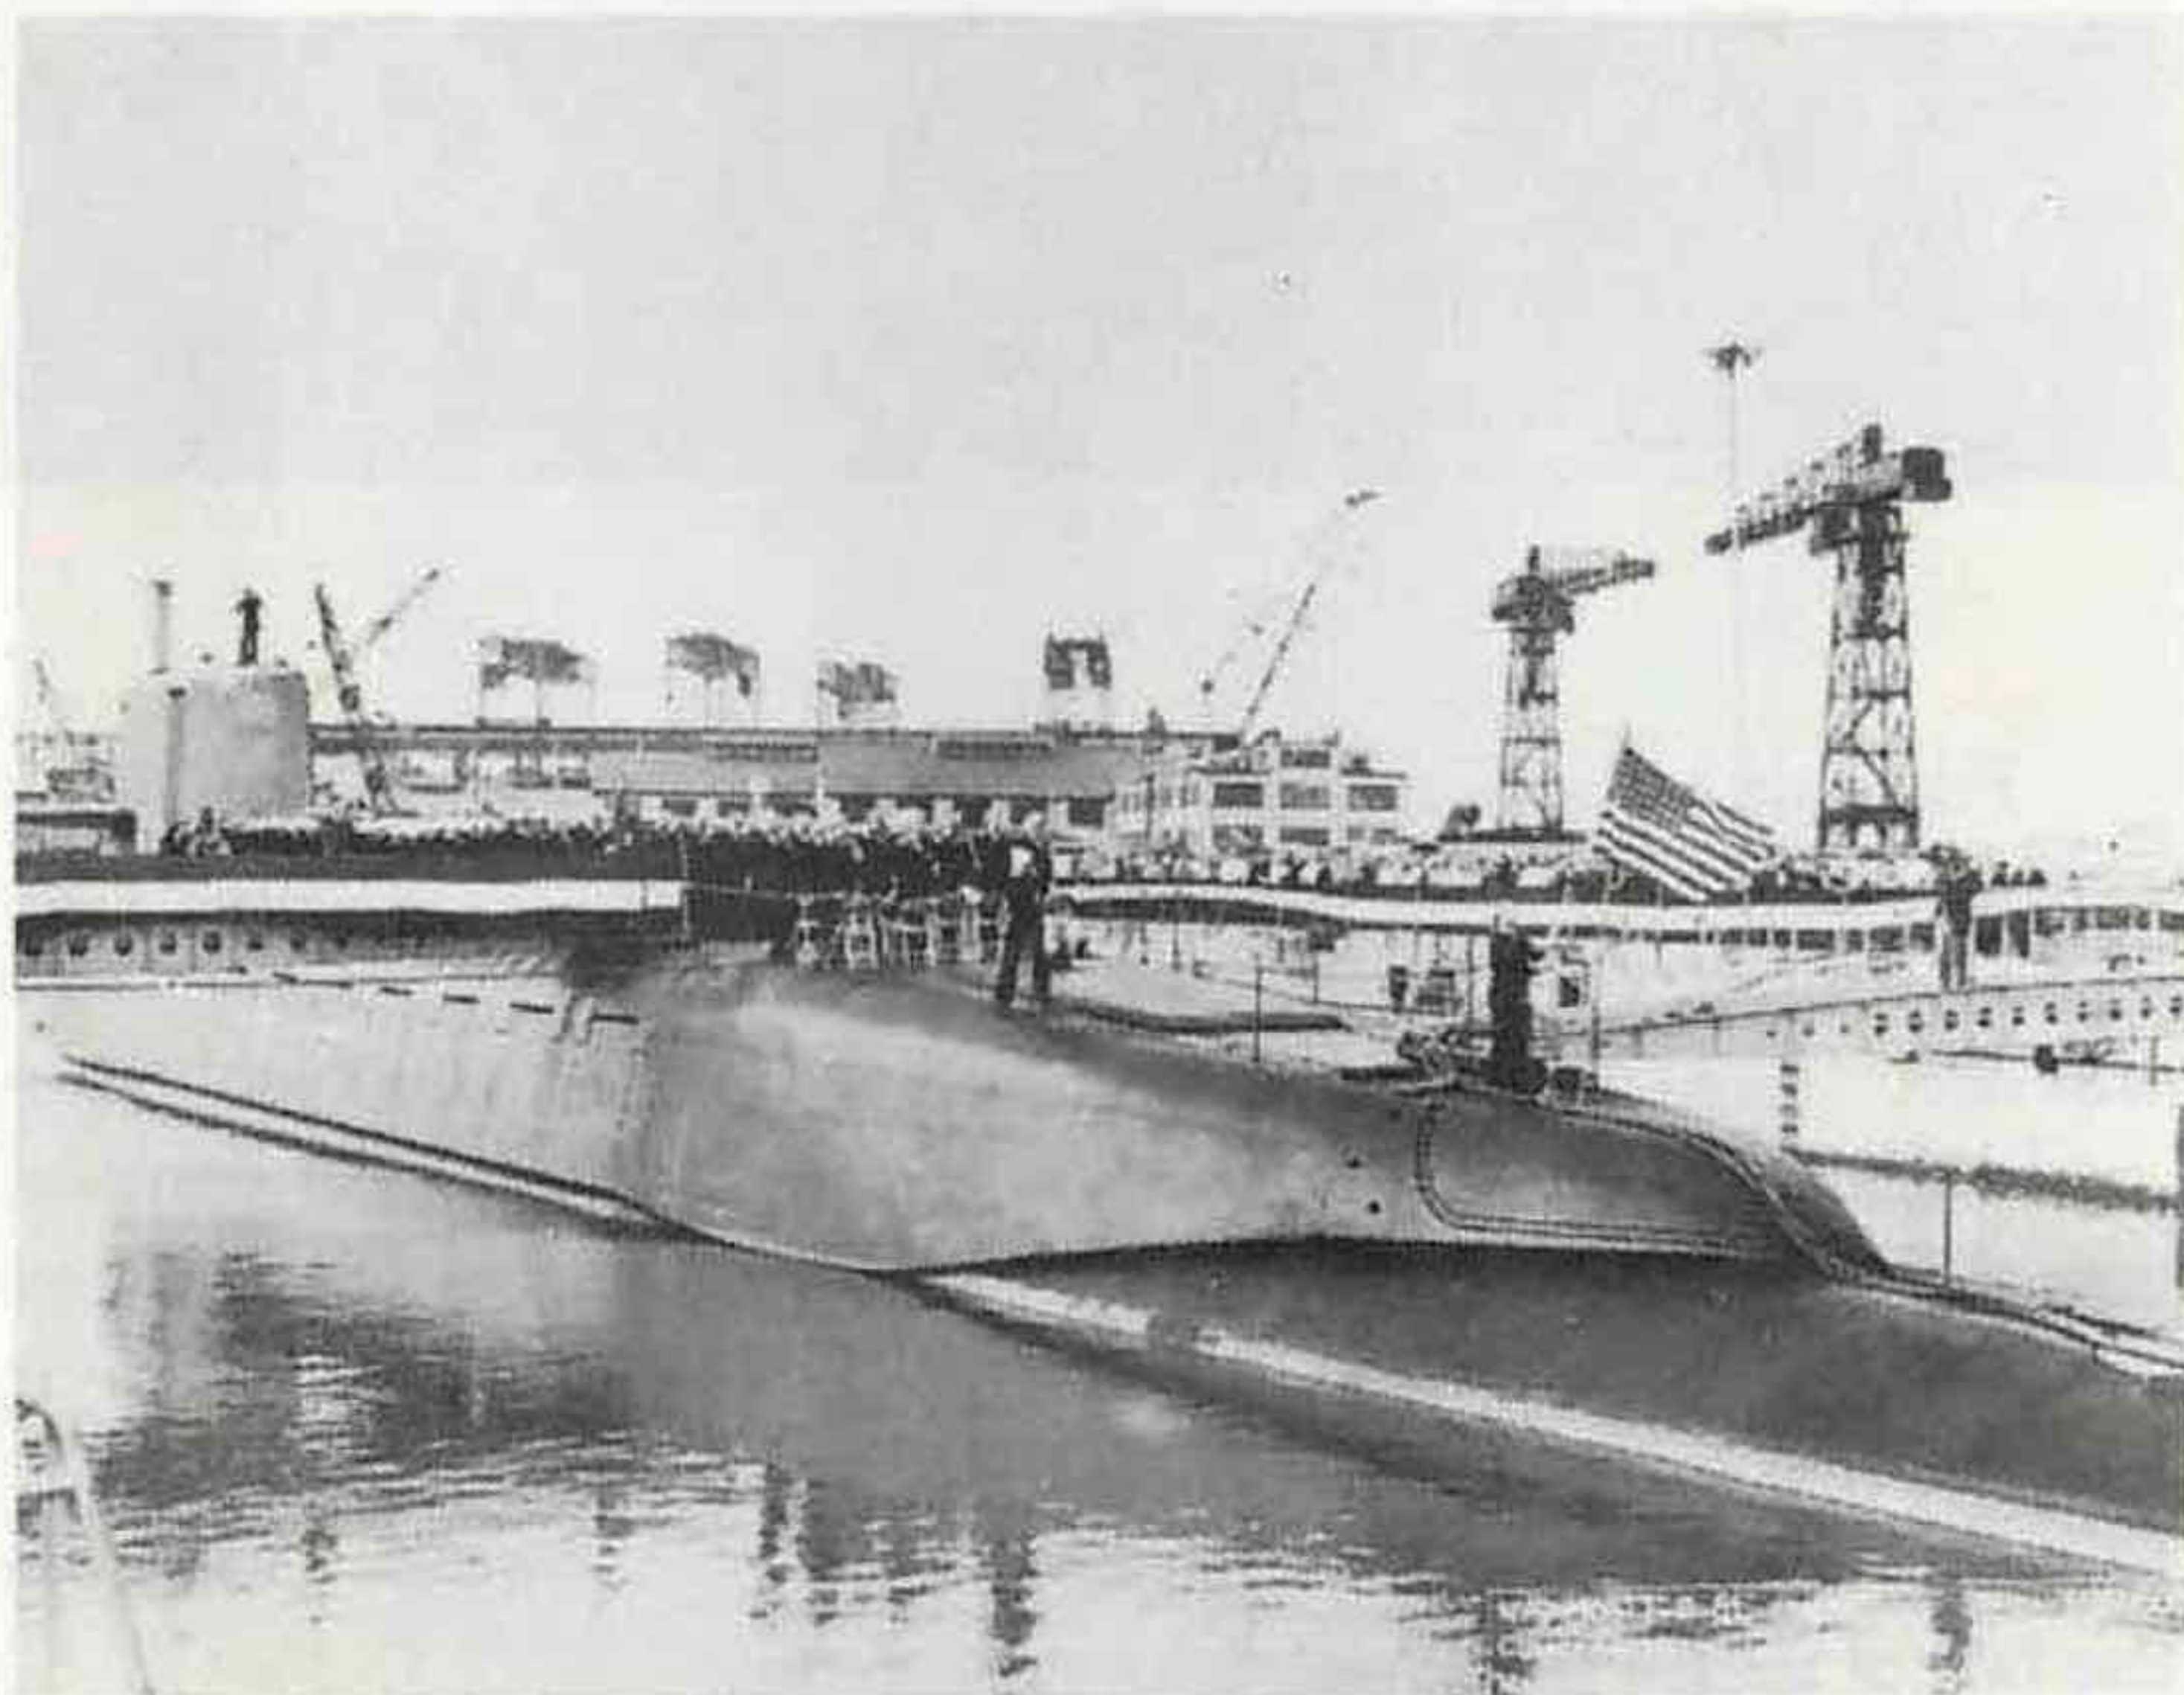

Theodore Roosevelt, the 26th President of the United States, is best known for his political achievements, his Spanish American War campaign as a "Rough Rider," and for his vigorous endorsement of the outdoor life.

Theodore Roosevelt also exerted a profound and beneficial influence on the development of our modern concepts of applied sea power. It is a very distinct honor for a United States Ship to be named after this gifted and farsighted patriot.

Of all the great men who have been active on our public scene, Theodore Roosevelt would have been among the first to comprehend the unique capability that the Polaris force confers on the United States; it is very much in line with his famous advice to "speak softly and carry a big stick." The silent Polaris fleet carries a very big stick indeed.

HISTORY OF USS THEODORE ROOSEVELT (SSBN 600)

USS THEODORE ROOSEVELT (SSBN 600), the world's third Fleet Ballistic Missile Submarine, was built at Mare Island Naval Shipyard, Vallejo, California. Laid down initially as an attack submarine, the hull was lengthened during construction to accommodate sixteen Polaris tubes and their support systems. The ship was launched on 3 October 1959 by Mrs. Alice Roosevelt Longworth, daughter of the ship's namesake, and was commissioned on 13 February 1961. CDR W. E. SIMS, USN and CDR O. H. PERRY, USN took command of the first Blue and Gold crews, respectively.

USS THEODORE ROOSEVELT departed Mare Island for Cape Kennedy, enroute becoming the first ballistic missile submarine to transit the Panama Canal. She fired her first Polaris missile on the Atlantic Missile Range on 20 March 1961, and on 19 July of that year departed on her first strategic deterrent patrol. Between July 1961 and June 1965 USS THEODORE ROOSEVELT conducted seventeen successful patrols, operating out of the refit site at Holy Loch, Scotland.
